MEMORANDUM AND ORDER
July 9, 2020

After police officers instructed a cooperating witness to arrange a drug purchase, the defendant, Sebastian Batista, drove to the arranged meeting spot and called the cooperating witness to let him know he was there. The investigators then stopped Mr. Batista's car and ordered him out of it. The cooperating witness identified Mr. Batista, and the investigators arrested him. They searched Mr. Batista's car and found 200 grams of fentanyl under the driver's seat.

Mr. Batista has moved to suppress the fentanyl as having been obtained in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights because the law enforcement officers did not have either probable cause and a warrant or exigent circumstances allowing them to search the car. I will deny the motion to suppress because the investigators had reasonable suspicion sufficient to stop the car and probable cause to search it.

I. BACKGROUND

On February 28, 2019, investigators, including Special Agents James B. Cryan and Tyler L. McNally of the Drug Enforcement Administration and Detective Jason Ferranti of the Waltham Police Department, arrested the target of a federal investigation for trafficking fentanyl. The target agreed to be a cooperating witness to identify his drug supplier.

At 6:28 that evening, under the direction of Agent Cryan, the now-cooperating witness called Mr. Batista from the cooperating witness's living room. The call was recorded. The cooperating witness asked Mr. Batista during this call if Mr. Batista would sell him 200 grams of fentanyl. Mr. Batista asked where the fentanyl that he gave the cooperating witness the day before was, and the cooperating witness said it was sold. They hung up.

At 6:41 PM, the cooperating witness called Mr. Batista again. Mr. Batista agreed to sell the cooperating witness 200 grams of fentanyl and they agreed to meet "there," which the cooperating witness understood to mean their usual meeting site on Pine Vale Road in Waltham.

Agent Cryan, Detective Ferranti, and the cooperating witness drove in a law enforcement vehicle to a location closer to the meeting site. Agent McNally drove to the meeting location in an unmarked police vehicle. Agent Cryan directed the cooperating witness to call Mr. Batista, who told the cooperating witness that he would be there in 25 minutes. This call was recorded. Agent Cryan, Detective Ferranti, and the cooperating witness drove to the meeting site location and parked on a side street with a view of the meeting site. Other investigators drove a white van, which Mr. Batista knew belonged to the cooperating witness's drug trafficking partner, to the meeting site itself.

At 9:00 PM, investigators drove the white van along Hardy Pond Road towards Trapelo Road, and Mr. Batista drove a black Jeep Cherokee in the opposite direction. Mr. Batista called the cooperating witness and each confirmed that the other was at the meeting site. Mr. Batista then called the cooperating witness again, told him that the cooperating witness was being followed (Mr. Batista seemed to believe that the cooperating witness was in the white van), hung up, and sped towards Trapelo Road.

Over the radio, Agent Cryan instructed the other investigators to stop the Jeep Cherokee. Agent Cryan then drove towards the Jeep Cherokee. The investigators stopped the Jeep Cherokee at the intersection of Pine Vale Road and Trapelo Road. Agent McNally and Officer Neil Joyce approached the Jeep Cherokee with their guns drawn and ordered the driver, later identified as Mr. Batista, to step out of the car and put his hands up.

Agent Cryan pulled up to the traffic stop at Pine Vale Road and Trapelo Road shortly thereafter and observed a man outside the driver's side door. He drove his vehicle within a few feet of the man, and the cooperating witness said, "That's him." When Agent Cryan asked, "Who?" the cooperating witness replied, "That's Jonathan," which was the name by which the cooperating witness knew Mr. Batista.

Agent Cryan reported over his radio to the agents on site that the cooperating witness had identified Mr. Batista, and the agents responded by handcuffing Mr. Batista and putting him into a law enforcement vehicle

The investigators then pulled Mr. Batista's Jeep Cherokee over to the side of the road and searched it. They found 200 grams of fentanyl in a compartment under the driver's seat. The investigators also recovered two cell phones from Mr. Batista's car, one cell phone rang when an officer used a different phone to dial the number the cooperating witness had used to contact Mr. Batista.

Mr. Batista has submitted an affidavit in support of his motion to suppress. His affidavit contains no inconsistencies with the affidavits filed by the government. He does allege a few additional facts: a police officer told Mr. Batista that his license plate was not valid; the white van arrived at the stop after Mr. Batista was arrested and put into a police car; Mr. Batista heard an officer tell another that "he thought they had stopped the wrong person;" the police searched Mr. Batista's car for about half an hour. The additional fact about the timing of the white van's arrival is not material because the cooperating witness was not in the white van, and Mr. Batista's affidavit does not conflict with the government's affidavit evidencing that the cooperating witness identified Mr. Batista before he was put into the police car. The only potentially material fact in Mr. Batista's affidavit is his statement that an officer said that he thought they had stopped the wrong person.

II. ANALYSIS

The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution protects individuals from unwarranted searches and seizures by the government. However, the right is not absolute and there are exceptions to it, especially in the automobile context. The investigators here had at least reasonable suspicion to pull the black Jeep Cherokee over, and having done so they developed probable cause to search the car. Under these circumstances, I find several exceptions to the warrant requirement apply.

A. Stopping the Vehicle

The investigators were permitted to stop the black Jeep Cherokee because they had a reasonable suspicion that the driver was engaged in illegal conduct. See U.S. v. Arnott, 758 F.3d 40, 43 (1st Cir. 2014).

The validity of this kind of stop, called a Terry stop, is assessed at two steps. Id. First, police may not stop the vehicle "unless they have a reasonable, articulable suspicion about an individual's involvement in some criminal activity." Id. (citing Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 21 (1968)). Second, if the initial stop was valid, any subsequent actions that the police undertake "must be reasonably related in scope to the stop itself unless the police have a basis for expanding their investigation." Id. quoting United States v. Ruidiaz, 529 F.3d 25, 28-29 (1st Cir.2008).

The Supreme Court recently reiterated its view that reasonable suspicion can rest on "factual inferences based on commonly held knowledge [officers] have acquired in their everyday lives." Kansas v. Glover, 140 S. Ct. 1183, 1190 (2020). Reasonable suspicion is a "commonsense non-technical conception[] that deal[s] with the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act." Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 695 (1996) (quoting Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 231 (1983) (internal quotation marks omitted)). A "reasonable suspicion" in this context is "more than a naked hunch" but "less than probable cause." Arnott, 758 F.3d at 44 (citations omitted). In determining whether this standard has been met, I must consider "the totality of the circumstances." Id. Thus, where agents had "monitored [defendant's] nefarious activities for several weeks" and his drug deals in that time period mirrored the events of the night in question, police had reasonable suspicion allowing them to stop the defendant's car. Id. See also Machado v. Weare Police Dep't, 494 F. App'x 102, 105 (1st Cir. 2012 (per curiam)).

The officers here clearly had reasonable suspicion that Mr. Batista was engaging in criminal activity. A cooperating witness at the investigator's direction had called Mr. Batista, with whom he said he had prior drug dealings, to set up this buy. Mr. Batista drove to the location he and the cooperating witness had agreed to. The recorded telephone calls evidenced prior drug dealings between the two, which the cooperating witness indicated took place at that location. Agent Cryan had good reason to believe that Mr. Batista was driving the Jeep Cherokee after Mr. Batista called the cooperating witness as the Jeep Cherokee drove by the white van that Mr. Batista thought contained the cooperating witness. The officers had, at least, reasonable, articulable suspicion that Mr. Batista was involved in criminal activity—namely, that he was dealing drugs that evening and was driving to that agreed location to deliver those drugs. They were, therefore, not acting unconstitutionally when they stopped the black Jeep Cherokee and ordered the driver to step out. Given the totality of the evidence, Mr. Batista's statement that he heard an officer say he thought they had stopped the wrong person does not disturb my finding that the officers nevertheless had reasonable suspicion to stop the car.

Mr. Batista argues that the stop was unlawful because it was a de facto arrest. "[A]ssessment of whether the agents exceeded the permissible scope of intrusion is a difficult, fact-intensive inquiry." United States v. Jones, 700 F.3d 615, 624 (1st Cir. 2012). Establishing that a stop became a de facto arrest is not easily done; "[m]easures such as the use of handcuffs, drawn weapons, placing suspects face down on the ground, the presence of multiple officers, and police cruisers positioned to block exits, do not necessarily turn a stop into a de facto arrest." Id. at 625. Moreover, the length of Mr. Batista's stop was not unreasonable or suggestive of impermissible detention. He was pulled over, he was ordered out of his car, he was identified, and he was arrested. The officers behaved reasonably in response to a developing situation. Id.

B. Searching the Vehicle

Having lawfully stopped the car and arrested Mr. Batista, the investigators were permitted to search the car under several exceptions to the warrant requirement.

First, the investigators were permitted to search the car under the automobile exception to the warrant requirement because they had probable cause to believe that there was contraband in the car. United States v. Silva, 742 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2014). "Probable cause exists where the totality of the circumstances demonstrates 'a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place.'" United States v. Morales Torres, 382 F. Supp. 3d 131, 135 (D. Mass. 2019) (quoting United States v. Tanguay, 787 F.3d 44, 50 (1st Cir. 2015)). In Morales Torres, officers were permitted to detain the defendant and search his vehicle without a warrant because the defendant arrived at the location he had arranged to meet a cooperating witness at the time they had arranged to meet, the defendant called the cooperating witness when he arrived at the location, the defendant and his fellow passenger gave conflicting answers to police questions about where they were going, and a cellphone rang inside the vehicle while the cooperating witness was calling the defendant. 382 F. Supp. 3d at 135-36. These factors amounted to probable cause that the vehicle contained contraband. Id. at 136. As in Morales Torres, investigators had probable cause to believe that Mr. Batista's car contained contraband.

Second, the investigators were also permitted to search the car as a lawful search incident to Mr. Batista's arrest. Police officers may search "the passenger compartment as well as the contents of any containers found within the passenger compartment of a vehicle in which the defendant is found at the time of arrest." United States v. Allen, 469 F.3d 11, 15 (1st Cir. 2006). The scope of the officer's search is limited to the area that the defendant could reach without exiting the vehicle. Id. Where officers have sufficient reason to believe a vehicle contains drugs, they may pull the car over and arrest the occupants. Id. at 13-14. Thus, in Allen, the First Circuit upheld the district court's determination that the officers' subsequent search of the car was valid as a lawful search incident to the defendant's arrest. Id. at 15. See also United States v. Laurent, 607 F.3d 895, 903-04 (1st Cir. 2010)(upholding district court's denial of motion to suppress drugs found in car where "the car search was permitted because there was probable cause to suspect drugs would be found there").

The officers' search of Mr. Batista's car was lawful as incident to their arrest of Mr. Batista, given that they had probable cause to believe the car contained drugs.

Finally, even if the officers did not have probable cause to search Mr. Batista's car, I would not suppress the drugs because they would inevitably have been discovered when Mr. Batista's car was towed after his arrest. "Evidence which comes to light by unlawful means nonetheless can be used at trial if it ineluctably would have been revealed in some other (lawful) way, so long as (i) the lawful means of its discovery are independent and would necessarily have been employed, (ii) discovery by that means is in fact inevitable, and (iii) application of the doctrine in a particular case will not sully the prophylaxis of the Fourth Amendment." United States v. Zapata, 18 F.3d 971, 978 (1st Cir. 1994).

It is standard policy for the Waltham police department to inventory the contents of a car before towing and impounding it. As a consequence, there were independent lawful grounds for a search of Mr. Batista's car, pursuant to which the car would have necessarily been searched and the drugs inevitably found after he was arrested.

III. CONCLUSION

For these reasons, I DENY the motions [Dkt. Nos. 41 and 59] filed by Mr. Batista's successive counsel to suppress the fruits of the stop and search of his vehicle.
